

The radio communication system for the New Horizons Pluto flyby mission is challenging due to the extreme distance involved and the limited power available on the spacecraft. These challenges have been met with a high gain antenna that operates at cryogenic temperatures (top) and a low-power, ultrastable receiver system for communications and navigation (bottom).